A common question I get from people following the low FODMAP diet is can I cook with high FODMAP ingredients and then just remove them from the meal before I eat it and get away with it? And the answer is, yes of course you can. And also no, actually you can't.

I will explain what I mean but first let me introduce myself. MY name is Joe Leech. I am a dietician. I make a lot of content around low FODMAP diet, IBS and gut health. My website is DietvsDisease.org. If you want more information you can go there and click FODMAPs or search in the toolbar there.

So let me explain. My phone was ringing. Okay. So let me explain. Basically FODMAPs mix with water so if you're cooking them ... I'll cover my second ... Mix with water. So if you are cooking them with food that contains water which is basically every single food. It is all foods. Then what will happen is the FODMAPs will come out of the food for example, onion or garlic are going to mix in with the other food that you are cooking, if it's a meat or vegetables or whatever. It's going to be mixed up and even if you remove the high FODMAP food what's left is still going to be ... There's still going to be FODMAPs left in the other food you're cooking.

So in that instance, no you can't cook high FODMAP ingredients and remove them. Now on the flip side the reason that yes you can is because if you cook with them first and only in oil and on their own, then you can remove them. So let me give you an example. If you put olive oil in a pan and you start cooking some garlic or onion in that, you would leave them as quite big chunks so they would be easy to remove.

Then you can cook them and a lot of the aromas, the flavor compounds are going to come out of the onion or the garlic and will mix with the oil. But FODMAPs can't come out because they just don't mix with oil. It's like water and oil. The also don't mix. If you drop oil in water you'll see that it just bubbles at the top and that's the same here. The FODMAPs just will not go into the oil. So when you remove ... So they've got nowhere to go so they are going to stay in the garlic or onion. Then you can cook them for a little bit, remove those chunks so there's only the oil left and then you're left with a garlic or onion infused oil essentially. And then you can cook the rest of your meal and you'll still have those classic flavors that you're missing.

It's as simple as that really. Did I even point this one out? They don't mix with oil. So to recap, yes the mix with water so you can cook them with other foods at the same time. They don't mix with oil so you can use high FODMAP ingredients in oil, cook them, remove them. Make sure you remove them all and then you can cook the rest of your meal and then it works.

Hopefully you found it useful. Let me know if you've got any questions in the comments and I'll do my best to get back to those. If you know someone who might find this video really useful please share it with them or tag them in the comments. That would be much appreciated. that's all I got.
